

“Tomorrow Is Something We Know”

sci-fi comedy sketch idea (jdsteinhoff® 3.27.24)

In a coffee shop hangout of teenagers on Planet Ook, everyone is very excited about what is going to happen tomorrow. On Ook, everyone has a script that literally knows what will happen until the day you die, as a law of nature. Over time the Ookians have learned that it's a bad idea to turn to the last page. Over in the corner sits Wabsi. He turned to the last page. Now he just sits staring. Nevertheless, it is at everyone's individual discretion to look however far they wish, jump ahead in what they read without knowing what led up to it if they wish. At the moment, they've all gone at least as far as tomorrow. And they're all very excited. Yet there is a lot of gossip, which leads to challenges to immediately check to see who is right. But at the moment the teens can share with each other their excitement about tomorrow, no matter what their differences are in terms of how far they've looked. Except Moogi, who doesn't look forward at all, and is perpetually putting his hands over his ears, aggravated that he might hear what he doesn't want to. Of course, everyone is always teasing him, pretending certain things will happen that won't, which he sort of guesses, with apprehension.